

Walsh said she has not heard any "rumblings" in her community indicating whether or not there will be a similar protest staged for this year's Day of Action, adding she's hoping for a peaceful day.

Sgt. Kristine Rae, the OPP's eastern region spokeswoman, said the provincial police force is currently operating at status quo and will continue to do so unless otherwise needed.

"In the event that something happens, obviously, we'll have people prepared but at this point in time there's no indication of too much," Rae said Wednesday.

One native protester, who spoke only with a guarantee of anonymity, would not comment on the upcoming Day of Action and said protesters are leery of speaking to the media in light of the recent string of charges laid by the OPP.

"None of us are interested in talking to the media right now because everybody that talks to the media either gets sued or they get charged or they get thrown in jail," he said.
